The on-off passion between Irina and Litvinov is a main theme, and the satirized discussions (which sometimes turn to smoke) between the traditionalists and the theorists, the decadent and the earnest, are a running theme throughout. Turgenev is strong on the tyranny of passion, its heights, sufferings and great dilemmas. A proper Russian novel.

Smoke, in particular, was Turgenev's contribution to the great controversy between the Slavophiles and those who championed western ideals for Russia. There is no doubt that Turgenev's own ideals are expressed by the ruined nobleman Potugin; and Litvinov himself, a rather quiet, ordinary young man, who has traveled over Europe studying technology and scientific farming, is the kind of man that ...

Ivan Turgenev gave his generation a literary legacy that dealt with the extraordinary moral complexities of his age. A novel of haunting beauty, Smoke is a fascinating account of one of Turgenev's favorite themes: man's inability to love without becoming a slave to the destructive power of passion.

Smoke on Apple Books

Smoke by Ivan S. Turgenev Smoke (1867) is considered a sequel to his most famous novel, Fathers and Sons, a critique of social reform in which he is apprehensive about the "intellectuals" who became responsible for shaping of future Russia. He considers the "new thoughts" of these charlatans as "no more than smoke--dirty, evil-smelling smoke."
